RABBI DOVID SPETNER

And He Called Out in the Name of G-d...

In his Antiquities of the lews, Josephus describes Abraham as "a man of great sagacity" who had "higher notions of virtue than others of his time." He therefore "determined to change completely the views which all then had about God."

One way of summing up 4,000 years of lewish history is to ask ourselves what would have happened to the human race if Abraham had not been a man of great sagacity, or if he had stayed in Ur and kept his higher notions to himself, and no specific lewish people had come into being. Certainly the world without the lews would have been a radically different place. Humanity might eventually have stumbled upon all the lewish insights. But we cannot be sure. All the great conceptual discoveries of the intellect seem obvious and inescapable once they have been revealed, but it requires a special genius to formulate them for the first time.

The lews had this gift. To them we owe the idea of equality before the law, both divine and human; of the sanctity of life and the dignity of the human person; of the individual conscience and so of personal redemption; of the collective conscience and so of social responsibility; of peace as an abstract ideal and love as the foundation of justice, and many other items which constitute the basic moral furniture of the human mind. Without the lews it might have been a much emptier

(Epilogue, Paul Johnson's History of the lews)

THE "GIFT" OF THE JEWS THAT JOHNSON refers to, we know comes from the wisdom that G-d related to us through His Torah. This relationship began with Abraham and his discovery of the new and true concept of G-d.

In order to properly understand Abraham's new view of G-d, we need to ask: What was the commonly held view of God that Abraham determined to change?

I struggled with this issue for many vears.

Rambam (Maimonides), at the beginning of his Laws Concerning Idolatry, describes a scenario where mankind had completely forgotten the existence of the One G-d of Adam and Noah, until Abraham enlightened them.

I had difficulty believing that mankind could so quickly forget Who had created the world and Who had made the Flood—to the extent that they were now worshipping stars and stones. I debated this with my rebbi, Rav Yaakov Weinberg, z"l, who supported the Rambam's position. (Regarding the worship of idols, he wisely told me, "Never underestimate people's potential for stupidity.") I developed an alternative scenario, but I hesitated in accepting my own idea. Although Rambam did not build his position based on the words of our holy Sages in the Talmud, I nonetheless withheld my own judgement of the matter, knowing Rambam to be incomparably wiser than me and having no other giant of Torah on which to hang my hat.

That is, until I discovered the words of Rabbeinu Nissim in his D'rashos (Va'es'chanan, #9). Unlike Rambam, who believed idolatry to have no real power, Rabbeinu Nissim maintains that idolatry was a real spiritual force that G-d had created—a kind of "dark energy" that idolaters could channel for their benefit if they rejected a direct relationship with G-d. He also disagrees with the Rambam's assertion that the world before Abraham had forgotten G-d. Rather, he writes, they mistakenly believed that G-d had removed Himself from direct interaction with humanity. People believed that they were expected to control their own destinies by calling upon the spiritual energies that G-d made available through idolatrous practice.

After the sin of Adam, mankind felt that it had been rejected from a direct relationship with G-d. People felt exposed to the chaotic forces of nature, and many chose to utilize the forces of idolatry to try to control their lives and fortunes. (Think Indian rain dances.)

And He Called Out in the Name of G-d... CONTINUED

Abraham, however, saw a world of goodness, of chessed (kindness). He saw a G-d still intimately involved in the good, and that even the bad was under the control and direction of G-d. This was Abraham's truly revolutionary idea, an idea that still challenges us and our world today. We see evil perpetrated by both man and nature and want to know, "Where is G-d?" Abraham challenged us to believe—nay, to incorporate into our very being—the idea that everything that occurs to us is part of G-d's plan for us, personally, both the good and the bad. To be true to Abraham's vision, we need to each believe that the Creator of this vast universe is interested in a relationship with us, like a parent to a child.

The prophet Isaiah captured this idea in his closing prophecy:

So says the L-rd: "The heavens are My throne, and the earth is My footstool... But to this one will I look: To one poor and of crushed spirit, who hastens to do My bidding." (Isaiah 66)
